Gender and Pentecostal Revivalism - Making a Female ...
Gender and Pentecostal Revivalism provides an interdisciplinary, theoretically engaged answer to an enduring question for charismatic Christianities: how do women lead churches? By examining the ministries of two famous (and infamous) Pentecostal revivalists, Maria Woodworth-Etter and Aimee Semple McPherson, this study shows that a woman's success in the ministry was not simply about access to ordination.

Payne's book, Gender and Pentecostal Revivalism: Making a Female Ministry in the Early Twentieth Century, adds to what has become a wealth of good scholarship on female evangelists. Woodworth-Etter is less known but McPherson has been the subject of several excellent biographies by leading scholars of American evangelism, such as Edith Blumhofer and most recently Matthew Sutton.

In the process, the women created biblical theologies that are alive and well in Pentecostal-charismatic circles today. Their negotiations of gender, race, class, and religious leadership continue to inspire generations of imitators, and their stories illuminate how female ministers were made in early twentieth-century America.
